

By the end of the card sorting process, it generally ended with around 4 separate piles (sometimes five if including the discard pile). The title cards that I selected out of the 18 cards made, were Archive, Contacts, About the Author and Art Gallery.

Archive was reserved for more comic content, containing the cards Comic Chapter, Recent Comic Upload, Upload Date, The Beginning Comic Page and User Comments. I feel that most of it is self-explanatory, with most of those cards having to do with the actual comic content and the organization of it. User Comments was placed in there, to give the reader the ability to give their feedback or thoughts for a specific part of the comic/story.

Contacts contains the cards Email Me, Email List Sign Up and Twitter Feed. This seemed pretty straight forward, giving the users the ability to contact me for whatever reason, as well as allow me to keep the users updated on my website. Other cards that could've gone in here were DeviantArt Link and User Comments, since technically I could be contacted there. I felt that DeviantArt is more so for artwork that I've made before, and maybe later, and User Comments was already explained.

About the Author had Inspiration for Comic, Comic Summary and Character List. This being the about section, for the website, whether for me or the story. The character list could technically be incorporated into the comic itself, though I feel something like that would be better in a physical book, than the site. Thus I figured making it into a sub heading to Comic Summary could work out.

Finally, Art Gallery includes Character Art, Random Doodles and DeviantArt Link. This is for any non-story related drawn content that I want to put up.